Developing dinosaur tourism

The Eromanga Natural History Museum is building a new viewing gallery for Australia's largest ever dinosaur fossil, thanks to $2 million in funding support from the Queensland Government's Growing Tourism Infrastructure Fund.

The museum, which showcases the incredible diversity of Outback Australia's natural history, is using the funding to extend viewing galleries for the 30-metre skeleton of a sauropod dinosaur named Australotitan cooperensis, or 'the southern titan'.

Since 2018, the government has contributed almost $23 million to 22 tourism infrastructure projects in Outback Queensland. Fourteen projects have been completed with another 8 projects underway. Collectively, the projects are forecast to create 278 jobs during construction and 131 operational jobs, attracting an additional 167,850 annual visitors to the Outback and $30 million in annual overnight visitor expenditure.

In addition, the Unite and Recover $25 million Queensland Tourism Icons Program has provided $3 million to 17 tourism programs in Outback Queensland, and the $7 million Growing Indigenous Tourism Fund has provided $1 million towards The Fringe Camp, which will provide unique cultural tourism and immersive 'Desert Mob' experiences in the Barcaldine region.
